

Kick butt this Christmas: What every city needs -- The Randy Leonard Ultra Poseable Deluxe Action Figure

By The Oregonian Editorial Board

November 27, 2009, 4:14AM

Fight school fires! Shut down adult bookstores! Hassle a restaurant owner! Rip duct tape off parade routes! Just in time for today's Black Friday shopping scrum, we're introducing the Randy Leonard Ultra Poseable Deluxe Action Figure.

This isn't one of those soft, mute and motionless City Hall dolls that second-guess the cops, see both sides of issues and parade around the office in hard hats. This is a Commissioner of Action, a figure made of the very hardest plastic. Although nothing can possibly dent it, some buyers have discovered that the Randy figure does occasionally lose its head.

Randy comes packaged as a deceptively mild-mannered elected official wearing jeans and a high-neck, long-sleeve black shirt. But it transforms in seconds into fully outfitted firefighter, complete with breathing apparatus, or into an angry, red-faced avenger leading a HIT team* into some sleazy firetrap that nobody else has the gumption to shut down. (*Sold separately! Collect all six, including the Randy figure's BFF, who comes in a 6-foot-8-inch tall package! Shipping not included.)

Imagine the joy on your child's face on Christmas morning when he or she opens a package and discovers the Randy action figure, plus the enclosed package of six broken ax handles. By noon, your kids could be playing Portland city commissioner, scaling the roofs of burning schools with real firefighters, busting into unsuspecting businesses and generally allowing every other city issue to go unaddressed.

And that's not all. Act now, and we'll throw in two new outfits with your Randy Leonard Ultra Poseable Deluxe Action Figure. One puts a sympathetic, eager-to-help Randy behind the wheel of a MAX train. The other changes quickly into the uniform of a transit cop charged with subduing unruly 12-year-olds. (Beanbag shotgun not included.)